

Other Interventions, if Required

Poems

2025

John Cole

Acknowledgements

Thanks to the editors of Poetry Pacific for publishing “Prompts” on their website in the fall of 2025, Hart House Review for publishing “A Bouquet of Roses” and “Tips for Budding Poets No. 7,” Straylight Literary Magazine for publishing “Ode to My Post-its” and to my readers Kirsty Barclay, Kevin Bazzana, Adam Beck, Grant Brown, Peter Burt, Greg Caisley, Michael Cole, Andrea Cole, Robert Dormer, Michel Dubosc, Don Fowler, Michael Gorman, Daryl Jamieson, Steve Kolak, Andy Lightfoot, Claudia Lipsey, Michale Longton, Tom McGinley, Brendan McGowan, Wendy Mitchell, Lorna Nakashima, Stephen Parkinson, Hugh Peaker, Yvette Poorter, Taras Sak, Florence Smith, Matt Wickham, Charlie Worthen, I’m very grateful for your feedback on my poems, some of which are included in this collection—your encouragement keeps me going. A very special thanks to Ken Autrey, Bob Metcalf, Chris Moore, Ron Klein, Bill Parsons, Jim Ronald and Warren Tang, for attending to minutiae and for the invaluable advice they offered.

Biography

John Cole is a Canadian-born composer and poet now living in Hiroshima, Japan. He studied music in Canada at the University of Victoria (B.Mus) and Simon Fraser University (MFA), and in Hiroshima, Japan, at Elizabeth University of Music (D.Mus), where he wrote his dissertation on the music of Jo Kondo.

Over the years, he has taught courses in composition, music history, theory, analysis, and sound art at institutions in Canada, Japan, and China.

When COVID closed down concert venues, John turned his attention to poetry and found it a medium that suited him. His poems reflect his background in music, often shaped by careful attention to form, structure, and rhythm.

His poems have appeared in The Lake, Poetry Pacific, Eskimo Pie, Flora Fiction, Hart House Review and Straylight Literary Magazine.

He lives in Hiroshima with his wife and two sons and travels periodically to China.

For my mother Maggie Cole

(March 14, 1940 – October 4, 2024)

Contents

Balloons / 5
Prompts / 6
The Tin-Eared Nymph / 8
Symmetries / 9
Pages / 10
Numbers / 11
Birds / 12
Quoting Zeno / 13
Loving the Large Glass , Still / 14
Throwing Pebbles in a Pond / 15
Try Not to Think of Poe / 16
Love's Longings / 17
Other Interventions, if Required / 18
Carpe Carnem / 19
To Whom it May Concern / 20
The Launch / 21
Advice for Poem Owners / 22
Ode to My Post-its / 23
A Bouquet of Roses / 24
Sunday Morning / 25
A Diatribe to My Kindle-Toting Friends / 26
Five Bird Quips / 27
Tips for Budding Poets No. 7 / 28

BALLOONS

for Mom

Remember the moment
George snatched
the balloons

from the balloon man and you started to rise
with him

higher and higher and higher until

you could see your toy cars and trucks and the bright blue dots

of the shopper's hats and that's where you wanted to stay forever or for at least a few more minutes

nestled
into her love
before the lights went out.

PROMPTS

for Taras

“People worry that computers will get too smart and take over the world, but the real problem is that they’re too stupid, and they’ve already taken over the world.”

— Pedro Domingos

Write an extended free verse poem of about 350 words in twelve stanzas of roughly equal length, in the manner of a Pulitzer Prize-winning poem.
Embed, fuse, or decontextualize unlikely liaisons.
Ransack uncertainties.
Resort to invective or vilification at least once. Being careful to avoid stylish self-righteousness and glamour, concoct a catechism that compels the reader to continue.
Suggest machine- or dreamlike conceits involving the sixth sense. Then burrow into deceit, or prowl around immorality’s dark alleys.
Plunder with impunity to help cobble together a simulacrum of shamelessness (or humility) that offends at least four middle-class sensibilities.
Allow some similes to ramble on.
Set a few words free, or nudge them to incite a rebellion.
Mimic imitation’s false confidence.
Incorporate exotic mandates.
Hover over uncertainties here and there.
Offer a little merriment or flippancy (if required).
Contrive a line
that calls to children hiding under leaves.
Let some words linger on the tongue, or lounge in the larynx until a state of grace is reached, bringing joy and goodwill to all readers. Explore strange new words.
Seek out new lines and new lineation—to boldly go where no poet has gone before.

Near the end of the poem, convey solemnity, or just cavort with delight and frivolity for the fun of it.
Include allusions that ring, blink, freeze, or forge through snow-swept hollows.
Leave five lines to fend for themselves, or slither into shallows to divulge or concede something secretly.
See into the future, to somehow involve the sad story of a singer's withholding of air, focusing on her intransigence.
Permit a few transgressions, or propose alternatives to secondary suggestions involving slant rhymes that lurk in dim-lit caves or mosey up to the water's edge to summon spirits.

THE TIN-EARED NYMPH

after Elizabeth Bishop's "The Colder the Air"

We must admire her sense of line, this artist of the evening air who sets to sound what she perceives—a single ayre
that turns with the wind and leaves.
It seems she chose it by design.

Her timid notes are reluctant to ring, they cling to the moss and wait for the cue from the opening chords—a single weight in the deep of the featherwood. Her words wobble. It seems she's unable to sing.

Her melody mimics the flow of her dream, a little too complex for some,
these myriad movements reduced to a single sum.
But oddly, clocklike, reproduced in wheels and chimes, or so it would seem.

SYMMETRIES

for Peter

Symmetries surface in unlikely places, surface in the sea's scuttle through the sand, unlikely in the shorelines I see in the puddle, in unlikely traces of tea leaves on the cup's surface, places unlikely in surface symmetries.

PAGES

for Flo

Silent for the most part holding their breath between turns then clearing their throats in soft coughs, usually alone but sometimes sounding with others, each turn the same left-hand gesture—thumb scraping curled edge, index finger pushing down the page, a double sound

I didn't notice until I started attending to this paper music, this delicate symphony of friction whispering through the library.

NUMBERS

for Wendy

Today a stranger sent me a video of nine hundred grunge guitarists pogo-jumping to Smells Like Teen Spirit, and three hundred drones dropped pigs' feet and rice to students who will eat alone in Shenzhen. Did you know that there are only seven fluent speakers of Heiltsuk on the B.C. coast, and thirty million yen worth of magnetic eyeliner sold in Tokyo this year?

Joshua counted three—not four—bees in the garden the other day, and reminded me there were over one hundred seventeen kids who did worse than him on the math exam.
Tesla tumbled fifteen percent, shedding twelve point five billion, and nine hundred thirty Chinstrap penguins on Heard Island will soon feel the heat of Trump's tariffs.

Jeremy says he has only six socks left, and according to this graph, if I live to eighty-five,
I have seven hundred fifty-seven million, three hundred eighty-two thousand, four hundred seconds to live (using leap-year average)—of which I have devoted five thousand thirty-two to write this poem for you.

BIRDS

for Nancy

When they hop over to us to peck the breadcrumbs from our palms cocking their heads in quicksilver flicks, their poker-faced gaze seems to be hiding something we can't quite catch, some secret message or apology—that stolen fig perhaps?

Birds don't mull over minutiae but burst into life, full throttle, in crisp flutters of compulsion. Inhabiting much thinner slivers of time than us, they have a knack for the deft attack and lunge at their prey in staccato snaps our cameras are too slow to catch.
Like poets, birds are happiest channeling signals from the wind and sea.

They peck our garden beds for seeds and grubs as we mine our brains for similes.
Being culminations of a distant age, birds hold their heads at a sage-like angle, when staring out at us from the glossy pages of Sibley's Bible.

Few birds are reliable.
They flit in and out of our lives like promises made in the heat of the moment.
Some are soft-hearted.
Others seem the ghosts of forgotten lovers when they inch up our shoulders to nip at our earlobes.

QUOTING ZENO

Zeno's
Yoctoseconds
X-pressed Within
Velocity
Upheld
Twelve
Suppositions—
Rather
Quirky
Paradoxes
Only
Now
More Likely Kept
Jokingly
In Hand
Given
For Example
During Conventions
By Astrophysicists

LOVING THE LARGE GLASS, STILL
for Claudia Lipssey

I'm still charmed by the chocolate grinder and the three dainty Chihuahua legs of the little table that somehow supports it, still perplexed by the mysterious movements of the Bachelors Apparatus, how that pole jutting upwards connects to the waterwheel and the nine Malic Molds, those sad bachelors bonding in their silly suits, still mystified by the mechanism in the bottom of the bride's domain that I imagined as the hammer, anvil, and bracket bones of the middle ear.
In student days I was impressed by how you let the wind shape the three Draught Pistons in the bride's Milky Way, and turned the fault lines of the glass cracks to your advantage, transforming disaster into art, thumbing your nose at the precious paint strokes of your friends, as you assembled your imagination, painstakingly etching the surface of your glass to affix your collection of dust, oil, varnish, lead wire, and foil.
O, to spend eight years beaver-ing away at a poem, just picking away at my words for a few hours a day, lovingly tracing them onto paper after a drag and a splash of Beaujolais, maybe write a book to explain it, even.

THROWING PEBBLES IN A POND

The wrinkled circlets traverse the water's surface, unfurling toward their endings beyond the range of my eyesight.
Each circlet seems a shivery life set off from the broken silence of these six pebble plops.
I watch them cross and marvel at how they manage to hold their shape through their marrying, their gracious give and take, each encompassed and encompassing, spreading outward to encircle as much of the world their rippling arms
can cradle.

TRY NOT TO THINK OF POE

when you write about a raven, or Ted Hughes, when your topic is a crow.
Now close your eyes and try not to think of an elephant or Gertrude Stein, when you write about a rose.
Don't let Bashō barge in when you write about the spring.
But if Ruth Stone sneaks inside you, let her teach your words to sing.

LOVE'S LONGINGS

Love longs to shed her exoskeleton, squeeze out of the cloying carapace of destiny and fate, rid herself of forever and endlessness. Love longs to swim naked through the dark over fear, mosey up to death and whisper sweet nothings in his ear.

I'll tell you a secret about what I learned of love:
she's a heartbreaker.
I saw her last week waiting in a bar
for James Tate,
burning his roses.

OTHER INTERVENTIONS, IF REQUIRED

or unfurl them, if extending them a little further works, or you could offer a tuft of fresh-cut grass, or the proper angle and articulation of those clawing gestures, or straight-up good old wonder if that does the trick, or place them closer or farther apart to gauge their reactions, or if you're feeling particularly adventurous, eat them, or cut them up into shell-shaped conduits, or toy-like paper columbines, or even crispy tidbits for the pigeons, or you could call them to task by their nicknames, or stick-trace the surface of their sandcastles, or, in a worst-case scenario, supersede them, or press them to acquiesce, or kiss them,
or cup them as she gathers snow, or tadpoles, or the river's revelations in her hands, or run from them on stilts, or consider castigation as an advantage, or imagine tuning them into forbidden frequencies, or rekindle the memory of snow settling in hollows, or on the tongues of forgotten lovers.

CARPE CARNEM

Today in my garden as I marvel at the mid-air mating of two swallowtails a scientist somewhere in Sumatra, knee-deep in a rice field, is seeking to reveal the Siamang's mammalian equivalents to our sweet nothings; Tarsiers in Borneo are tilting their heads in silence, sending and receiving ultrasonic signals to potential progenitors; and a pair of soapberry bugs have been clinging to each other for a week.
We humans in heat do weird things too on lazy afternoons gazing at screens for release ransacking satiation along the lips, tongues, and earlobes of our neural networks.
Some like to rumba, tarantella, fandango or tease each other in cheap hotels, prancing and preening in love-lace and g-strings graceless as the oily act of coitus

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

For Mike

My name is this cage I rattle at night, the three-word game I play with myself in the mirror that reflects the paucity of my parents' imagination.
I am writing to ghost away from the world for a few hours a day, to still my inner trembling, and am currently engaged in a frail gambit, a round of unraveling, involving the trace-lines of snails, with a strong interest in the stillness of abandoned swings.
I believe I can offer your team wisdom and solace through fresh revelations of my illicit liaisons with words.
Birds and wanderers also fuel my imagination, along with Indonesian Gamelan, something I feel your organization could benefit from.
I am confident that the wisps of my intransience and immutability are what your people need to sneak into the future, and would welcome the chance to burrow into your company's conceits, to root out outdated murmurings that hinder innovation.
With a background in soothsaying and extensive experience in gazing at the sea, I feel I am well positioned to weave a hint of wonder into your world, and would welcome the opportunity to discuss my application further at your convenience.

THE LAUNCH

for Dad

The boat we built sat for days under the worktable light, its balsa ribs butted together with that noxious glue, clamped to set overnight.
My job was to paint the gunwales and paper the hull, a delicate job for a boy of eight.

We set it on the ocean's skin, let the soft puttering of its little engine sputter out news of its grand, sad arrival to the gray-blue vastness. The thin tailfin, its only moving part, with a trifling one-inch swivel, would fix its future course, its haven.

The first launch signaled the start of summer, the beach—sand glistening, starfish lounging, crabblings crawling over our toes, the stench of glow fuel, salt and coconut, clinging to our drenched pants, the tidal-surge breach of my sand-castle walls, and that sudden lunge of our boat from my hands.

I remember the rings rippling off the bow and stern, their enfolding round the nervous mothers bellowing at their sunburned kids to turn and keep their balance on their blow-up sharks.

You were standing on a sandbar, pants rolled up to your knees, trying to steer it away from the wake of the waves to stop it from keeling. There was something spectacular in the way it forged ahead—all we'd been working toward now achieved. Still afloat, our steadfast soldier.

Sad somehow to witness its cocksure chug to the horizon, the weakening purr of its little engine sputtering its last farewell.
The batteries were dead; our remote had lost connection.
All we could do was wave farewell and hope for its return.

ADVICE FOR POEM OWNERS

Let them run leadless.

Let them nose through the dusty catacombs of used bookshops

in search of fading first editions.

Don't be shocked by what they bring home—dead birds, dirty socks, rotting rabbit carcasses are fine topics for open-minded owners to chew on.

Do not shout at your stanzas.

Reward the good lines with praise.

Most poems can be trained to drop listless adjectives on a gentle, soft-voiced command.

Poems crave routine.

They long to be read and written regularly, preferably in the early morning, on a freshly wiped table in a room facing a garden, window ajar to let in the wafts of squirrel-urine inspiration.

They feel most loved

after they have been published and collected and you are bending their ears.

ODE TO MY POST-ITS

There must be over ten thousand of them now, sprouting from the shy sides of my books, each colored flag vying for reinspection.

The one hundred and four that adorn the fore-edge of The Essential Neruda are performing magic today, like Seurat's dots morphing into wisps of cloud cover at Port-en-Bessin. I run my fingers over the prickly plastic tufts to test their tenacity, each still stuck to those words I may never revisit.

Left to the whims of others,

I worry you will wither and fall from your leaves, your glue turned to dust, your colors faded.

O, that my great-grandchildren, tasked with the job of pulling you out, might pause to ponder my obsessions, perhaps even work together to lick the riddle of the color coding: red for a slant rhyme, green for spondees, yellow for anaphora, blue for amphibrachs.

A BOUQUET OF ROSES

for Ken

I started out in Iqaluit, a treeless, windswept, icebound hamlet on Baffin Island, two thousand miles from the nearest dancehall, unless you were up for a frame drum, bone whistle, seed rattle jig at the mission with the locals.
My earliest memory is braving the insertion of my hand into the mouth of a splayed bear to graze the edges of its two canine teeth against my wrist, while returning the cold, hard stare from its black marble eyes.
Mom whispered the words of the overlords into the ears of the Inuit children.
Dad sipped his scotch and blew smoke rings into the lung-stinging chill.
Six years later there was laughter, hugs, broken dishes, and slaps, and a bouquet of roses after two days and four knocks on the door.
He dragged us through three provinces, ten house renovations, and a farm before slipping off to Africa, leaving his good wife in a field at four a.m. with her hand crammed into a uterus, searching for a stubborn lamb leg.
I moved to Japan and taught nursery rhymes to children in Kyoto and Western music to graduate students in Hiroshima, focusing on the war between Schoenberg and Stravinsky, how they ended up living within shouting distance in L.A., without ever reconciling—enthraling nuggets of history I soon realized my audience of five had no interest in.
I didn't marry the woman of my dreams, thank God, as we know how those fairy tales end.
My good wife is as happy in her lab hunting heparin bonds as she is kneeling in this garden prodding the soil with ten-inch chopsticks to break the will of last year's mint roots.
O Canada, I would hand you that bouquet of roses if I knew you'd take me back.
I still love you—but not enough to leave this legend-laced, Zen-drenched island that has yet to set me down from the three and a half inches I float over the ground.

SUNDAY MORNING

for Lorna

Let them sleep in today.
Leave alone to their dreams the long-lost robot's dismembered arm, the fallen figurines,
the chocolate-smudged pages of practice exams,
Madeline, Matilda, Green Eggs and Ham.
Don't yet wake the Lego blocks nestling with their dust bunnies under the bed, the G.I. Joe, the dominoes, the silly string wound round the wings of Skylanders.
Let lie a little longer the broken yo-yo, the pencil shavings shuddering in their slumber, the dismembered Rubik's Cubes, the crusted brush nibs, the missing caps, the sticky wad of snicker's wraps.
Let a sliver of light sneak through the blinds to heat the handle of the wizard's staff and cradle the glass that guards his shells and stones.

A DIATRIBE TO MY KINDLE-TOTING FRIENDS

But can you curl their ears?
Can you smell them?
Can you run your fingers down their spines?
Lost to you: the feel of the Everyman's Pocket Poets' quiet curves, and the pleasure of sneaking your fingers through the factory-uncut pages of your 1910 Keats's Poetical Works.
Will you ever gaze at your Kindle up close,
head slightly tilted,
to follow fonts and edge design, or from a few meters back to delight in the unlikely gathering of its Halloween-treat-bag of titles?
Will you ever steal into your garden at dusk for a long-distance glance, to relish the play of wine-light on their jackets, as they stand at attention like a drunken, ragged hodgepodge militia of misfits?
Can your Kindle calm a candle's light?
Can your Kindle be cradled while cuddling a child?
Can a drop of coffee, a chocolate smudge, or a tear stain be digitized?
How about the fading, penciled date of purchase, or the sloppy underlining of a phrase on a crowded Tokyo train, using a pen borrowed from a stranger?
And without a front free endpaper page, where can the lead trace of the words of thanks, praise, condolences, or—most importantly—seduction, be inscribed?
And where the hell on your machine do you affix the Post-its?

FIVE BIRD QUIPS

for Yvette

Robin on fencepost
chirrs and yeeps attentiveness—‘Musing humans will never catch a worm’ —Robin’s head-tilt tells us.

Starling over wheat field trills and rattles fearlessness—‘Our murmurations are a cipher’
—Starling’s wing-tilt tells us.

Chickadee in birdhouse slaps and hisses restlessness—‘The circle lets in moonlight but cannot keep out rain’ —Chickadee’s tail-tilt tells us.

Toucan of the Pantanal
Taps and clatters tenderness—‘Modesty cannot dull the luster of our beaks’
—Toucan’s bill-tilt tells us.

Basan between life and death flaps and flutters fleetingness—‘You are but a breath of frozen fire’
—Basan’s still tilt tells us.

TIPS FOR BUDDING POETS: NO. 7

for Warren

Don't expect your readers to reach out to you.
Offer your poems as gifts to the world.
Release them to the wind or sea.
Tie them to the legs of storks, greasy barstools, or vintage clawfoot lamps.
Wedge them under moss-swathed boulders in Japanese gardens, or let the tides slide your syntax over seaweed and sun-kissed sand.
Try singing them softly to sympathetic birds, who will spread your message to distant lands.
Affix them to cold white walls in corporate boardrooms, or to ceilings of cemetery columbaria.
Hang your tropes and strophes from disco balls and chandeliers in has-been hotel halls.
If you can slide a sestina through the eye of a needle, or into the hands of the poor, you are up to gifting a ghazal to lodging-home-carpet-cleaning staff.
Softly, without pushing, offer your chapbook to taxi drivers, clowns, and radiologists, or even—if you are feeling sneaky—slip a sonnet into the back pocket of a tourist you have tailed in an airport terminal, or a masquerade.