

Song and Dance

Poems

2024

John Cole

Acknowledgements

Thanks to the editors of Poetry Pacific for publishing “Burial” and “Woodpecker” in their 2025 edition and to my readers Kirsty Barclay, Kevin Bazzana, Adam Beck, Grant Brown, Peter Burt, Greg Caisley, Michael Cole, Andrea Cole, Robert Dormer, Michel Dubosc, Don Fowler, Michael Gorman, Daryl Jamieson, Steve Kolak, Andy Lightfoot, Claudia Lipsey, Michale Longton, Tom McGinley, Brendan McGowan, Wendy Mitchell, Lorna Nakashima, Stephen Parkinson, Hugh Peaker, Yvette Poorter, Taras Sak, Florence Smith, Matt Wickham, Charlie Worthen, much thanks for your feedback on my poems, some of which are included in this collection— your encouragement keeps me going. A very special thanks to Ken Autrey, Bob Metcalf, Chris Moore, Andy Lightfoot, Ron Klein, Bill Parsons, Jim Ronald, and Warren Tang, for attending to minutiae and for the invaluable advice they offered.

Biography

John Cole is a Canadian-born composer and poet now living in Hiroshima, Japan. He studied music in Canada at the University of Victoria (B.Mus) and Simon Fraser University (MFA), and in Hiroshima, Japan, at Elizabeth University of Music (D.Mus), where he wrote his dissertation on the music of Jo Kondo.

Over the years, he has taught courses in composition, music history, theory, analysis, and sound art at institutions in Canada, Japan, and China.

When COVID closed down concert venues, John turned his attention to poetry and found it a medium that suited him. His poems reflect his background in music, often shaped by careful attention to form, structure, and rhythm.

His poems have appeared in The Lake, Poetry Pacific, Eskimo Pie, Flora Fiction, Hart House Review and Straylight Literary Magazine.

He lives in Hiroshima with his wife and two sons and travels periodically to China.

Contents

Distance / 4
My Fears of Flying / 5
Epitaph / 7
Grandad / 8
Burial / 9
Visual Pleasures / 10
The Spider / 11
This Is Not an Arabesque / 13
Love Letter to My Youth / 14
Knott's in My Bones / 15
View-Master / 16
Joni Mitchell c. 1950 / 17
The Woodpecker / 18
Enough / 19
Leaves / 20
Kosame / 21
Pity the Poor Post-Modern Poem / 22
Cuboro / 23
What My Boys Show Me / 24
Tadpoles / 25
Song and Dance / 26
Waving Her Snow Angel Wings / 27
Watching Them Wander / 28
Something / 29
The Banyan Tree / 30
Thank You / 31
On Bodily Love in Time / 32

DISTANCE

Here
on the first day of spring meeting maskless at the crack of dawn on this enormous campus lawn nestled in the morning mist we are two dots in the lower left corner of a Zen landscape painting.

We're an odd pair.
Frog and Toad.
Me in my crumpled excuse for a suit, you in your crisp cap and navy-blue uniform garden tools dangling from your belt tinkling.

What different lives we lead.
Me, lugging papers in this leather bag.
You, clenching a rag in that hand that will never mark a paper with a red pen or tie a Windsor knot.

And yet, despite our distance I imagine us lying in our hospital beds across from each other raising our wineglasses.
"To our gardens" you say with that elfin gleam in your eye.
The one man with whom I would love to share my final drink.

MY FEARS OF FLYING

After forty years of flying the toilet flush still terrifies me.
It's not just the volume.
The hypersonic whoosh is a premonition:
the sound our soft bodies will make as we are sucked through the gaping hole in the fuselage into the subzero brain-numbing cold, shooting past the cheery flight attendant, who just passed us our little pillows and packets of mixed nuts, who is now screaming, as her bloodied fingers start to lose their grip on the rent steel edge of the emergency exit door frame, her navy-blue stockinged legs flapping in the wind like a pair of carnival flags in a typhoon.

When I gaze down at those endless rows of snow-tipped mountains popping their peaks through the cotton candy tufts of cloud, I'm the heroine of a Shirley Jackson story soon to be jogged out of her reverie by the cup and saucer tinkling of Satan's foreplay, powerless in this pressurized death tank to do anything but accept my fate, close my eyes and wait for the soft electronic bell ping of doom.

No, we are not 'experiencing a little turbulence'.
We are experiencing the ghastly prelude to our grisly death, and I am the only witness to the cause of our imminent crash, the one passenger bold enough to break the rules and slide my plastic sunshield up an inch to catch a glimpse of the twist, snap and fall of the left-wing engine.

My seatmate is giggling at Paddington 2 as I stare like a zombie at the plane icon's fitful jerks toward our destination, trying to wrap my head round the logistics of our disembarkation onto the six flimsy inflatable rafts in the middle of the Pacific on a dark and stormy winter night.

Is flying 35,000 feet above the ground five hundred miles away from the nearest runway in this impeccably calibrated precision-built aerodynamic marvel, utterly reliant on the flawless functioning of 10,000 mechanical miracles really safer than driving?
And what of the less likely but perfectly plausible list of what ifs?
A flock of seagulls sucked into the engines.
A lazy radar reader's fleeting lapse of judgment.
A loosened rogue bolt jamming the landing gear's fear.
Solar flares, supernova gamma rays, UFOs, innumerable, ornery acts of God.

EPITAPH

Will you please read them now?

GRANDAD

I remember his pipe, how he packed it, lit it, puffed it and snuffed the flame of the match with a flourish of his wrist, the smell of Cavendish on his breath.

I remember mending model airplane wings and following his fingertips round and round as he wound those tiny silver springs.

I remember his arm, so delicate and thin as it stretched to the top of the tree to set the silver star.

BURIAL

Thirty-six swipes to turn off the alerts.

Thirteen minutes to delete the apps.

Forty-seven stabs at the ground to dig the hole.

Twenty-three hefts and stomps to pack and tamp the soil.

Five hours of battery life.

Three hundred and twenty-three unanswered calls.

VISUAL PLEASURES

I remember her long lustrous hair, how she flicked it to the left over the nape of her neck smoothing in the stray strands with a deft twist of her wrist to emphasize a point.

And the contour of her delicate perfectly proportioned nose, her chin, her cheekbones, her lips.

Oh, her tidy lips, lightly painted prepped and primed for their well-rehearsed openings and closings!

I scanned her neck, the soft slant of her shoulders the rise and fall of her breath and marveled at how confidently she held her spine in perfect alignment.

How could any of us in that room not be entranced by those finely executed gestures – the raise of her right eyebrow the graceful sway of her elbows, the impeccably timed nimble unison closing of her thumbs and fingers asserting restraint, control, authority.

Even her shoes and the tasteful leggings cuddling her calves joined the chorus of her body crying
'Look at me' as she lectured to us on the scourge and torment of the male gaze.

THE SPIDER

After Elisabeth Bishop's "The Fish"

I caught a glimpse of her hanging from a single strand of silk, the tiny head tilted, revealing her eyes like a cluster of blackberry seeds.
Two bristly pedipalps jutting out from the base of her head twitched in short frantic bursts as if registering danger.
She dropped to the window ledge and froze, then moved ahead, furtively, in fits and starts, alert to the faintest vibrations of air and light.
I prodded her with my breath and marveled at the finical movements of the eight hairline limbs each acting independently cautiously probing every ridge and furrow of the surface of the wood.
She lured me along a mooring thread to one of her webs, flimsy, diaphanous, but 'stronger than steel' I remembered being told as a child, confused, when the sticky strands of silk were wiped from my face.
From the edge of the spiral she worked her way to the hub tugging the threads at the junctions purposefully, in measured movements, with one of her claw feet, testing tension,
tightening the knots,
or was she repairing them?
I was impressed by her poise swaying on her tightropes of silk, flexing the miniscule muscles of her boneless limbs.
What peculiar inborn talents, from navigating her first flight as a spiderling and spinning this impossibly intricate web to leaving her lineage encased in this delicate silk egg bed.

Three sharp jerks from the upper corner of her web jogged me out of my reverie to the drama of her tasty Houdini wrenching his silk straitjacket in frenzied hopeless thrusts, while she primed her fangs, indifferent to his torment waiting for him to tire before injecting her terrible poison.
Nudging my cleaning pail closer for my yearly ritual of expulsion, I prepared to wipe out in a single stroke this wondrous barbarous spectacle.
As I raised my rag I remembered drawing her, awkwardly, on orange poster paper with a paperless crayon stub on a wobbly desk at school, dancing with her friends the witches, black cats and bats. I stared and stared and reverence filled up the dusty crawl space, from the framework threads to the radials, the coiling viscus threads quickenning to the hub – until everything was spiraling, spiraling, spiraling!
And I let the spider go.

THIS IS NOT AN ARABESQUE

Not a song to someone.

Not a gift, a gargoyle or a gallant romp in regal finery through Flanders Fields.

Not that single malt to be sipped and savored.

Nor a tonic, a tease, or my raison d'être.

Nor a bet with the Devil, a bone for the dog, a prayer for peace, or my Für Elise.

Not something to send in a bottle in the vain hope that over the space of its journey through the ocean of oblivion it might just manage to catch the eye of the girl with the flaxen hair who will roll it out under the soft light of her desk lamp to savor this hymn to hush the night.

No.

It's just a poem.

LOVE LETTER TO MY YOUTH

To the sandbox by the curly slide Pogo, Pooh and Madeline
To deviled eggs and Ovaltine To life before the cash machine To late-night swings and all the things I wasn't meant to see To weepy Hummel figurines Christmas tarts and tangerines
And the tang of snowflakes on our tongues
To the thrill of opening the chocolate Santa calendar flaps
And the hush of our snowshoes soft swish
In the brittle air
To lava lamps and Lego blocks Gerbil tubes and German clocks with twirling maids a-milkin'
To mini golf and science kits, 8-track tapes and K-tell hits
And the boats and planes you built for us That sank and fell to the sea
To the rise and fall of my shark in the pool
And the three words of French I remembered from school To the Jehovah's Witnesses who passed on their pamphlets Adorned with cheery children Petting lions and bears in the Garden of Eden
To the girl from Sweden
Who flicked her flaxen hair for me
To Ironside and MTV
Marshall stacks and IMAX screens Joints and bongos and bell bottom jeans To rolling the top of the tin of the spam
To waterbeds, Slinkys, Green Eggs and Ham
To the Grateful Dead and that Playboy spread That I passed on to Bobby
... or Bill.

KNOTT'S IN MY BONES

Bill Knott's in my bones barreling left and right and in between.
He's my marrow's mourning caffeine this man, who has taken a knife to my brain and split it to inhibit redundancy.

'Listen to me' he says, sweetening the apples of my eyes to cry tart tears that drop like soft pins onto my fair lady's lips.

'Follow me' he says with a wink and a slip of his tongue knock-knocking on the doors of my bare bone walls.

Bill Knott's slipped though the seams of my soul to ferret out my fears who cover in the corners of my soft bits cuddling their lackluster poems.

VIEW-MASTER

The light.

The quality of that light streaming through the canopy of fern falling on the pudgy faces of garden gnomes frolicking in fields of foxglove who peek out of bushes to dip their rods into the calm of the blue-green stream.

That halcyon light gilding canyons, caves and stalagmites, fabled forests, waterfalls. The Seven Wonders of the World.

The Birth of our Savior. Garden of the Gods.

Sanctuary of our Sorrowful Mother.

We'd hold the disks in front of our lamps to sort our favorite scenes of eye-popping 3D delight neatly nested and doubled in fourteen fingernail squares of thermoplastic celluloid.

Now, half a century later, looking through the eye holes of my candy red vintage View-Master

I'm still enchanted, reliving the great anticipation, the thrill of the turn and click, savoring the spring-kick of the reel knob against my middle finger as I advance to the next miracle.

I remember late nights lying in our bunk beds imagining we were watchstanders manning our periscopes, the lazy afternoons lounging on bean chairs filing our disks into their sleeves and slots, and even that early morning we rushed to your bed to show you what Santa had brought us.

But it is the memory of that light that haunts me still.

That soft, soundless, tranquil,

Light.

JONI MITCHELL c. 1950

She's leaning on a post, left foot planted on the porch, right foot resting tilted on her toe, cowboy hat and holster bolstering her grit.
Her upper lip's bent in a sly smile, left arm akimbo wrist bent on hip, right hand holding her gun.
She's challenging her future to a duel.
She's staring down the sun.
This cowgirl's saloon doors have swung.
Mess with her my friend—You're done.

THE WOODPECKER

A

Bird

Can

Delight

Even

Forest

Ghosts

Howling

In

Jest

Knock-knocking

Lightly

Meandering

Nesting

On

Parched

Quills

Ransacking

Solemnly

Tap-tap-tapping

Under

Vast

Woodlands

Xerothermic

Yodeler

Zigzagger

ENOUGH

(In memory of Denise Levertov)

Today

I'll ferret it out from the five fragile beads of rainwater clinging to the branches of the persimmon tree.

I'll attend to the clipped, jagged caws of the crows and the starling's chirps as they pass over my head.

The soft play of early evening light on leaf, rock, and distant cloud will not be lost on me, today.
But my lines fall flat.
I'm left wondering how it is you can turn five drops of rainwater on a twig into poetry.

Returning home defeated
I understand.

To desire is enough.

LEAVES

A few of the young leaves lounge in their fruit beds oblivious to the lunge of the yellowjackets, and the wind's morning roll call to wake.
The early risers are rustling off to work brushing against each other along the thin lanes of the branches, which rise and fall as they squeeze into trains.
Some, not yet used to the precarious commute, stop to regain their balance on the sturdier sprigs, then carry on in fits and starts.
The wind is running late today rushing from tree to tree announcing the onset of the great games soon to follow, that riotous event that will pit the poor leaves against each other, rocking their boughs as they jump to cheer on their teams.
The earth and the wind wink and wait knowing they are the winners of this wicked yearly ritual, the only two left to dance round the naked trees until the earth is tired and calls for the glass of warm milk, the goodnight kiss.
Calls to the wind to tuck her in under her blanket of dead leaves.

KOSAME
(light rain)

Today I told them to write about anything for ten minutes without stopping just to hear the pitter patter of their pens.

PITY THE POOR POST-MODERN POEM

who waits in the dark for a finger to find him, crammed in the back of a book in a box.
Silly poem!
He makes more sense read upside down or top to bottom, right to left.
Bereft of poetic charm and grace the bookstores can't allot the space to stock him.
Even the anthologies are offering their apologies to the poor post-modern poem.
They can't accept his lexicon, his polysemic infobahn.
He's the message in a bottle in a code they cannot crack, a gaggle of geese flying north in the fall, an ontological free for all.
Oh, pity the poor post-modern poem, crammed in the back of that book in a box, so lonely dark and grim, waiting for a finger to find him.

CUBORO

We dumped the blocks and grouped them into bowls the tunnels, the turns, the falls to the left and right, then lined them up to link and lock the holes in place and at just the right height for a three-tiered course. If I dropped the red ones and you dropped the blue, we could cheer on our teams as they raced through the labyrinth, trace the runs of our marbles as they rocked in their troughs and ricocheted off the tunnel walls. One oddball, thumbing his nose at the race took his time to wobble through the run, savoring the pull of gravity, the sun on his face oblivious to the frantic calls of the clocks.
What's the prize after all? – a soft clunk in a wooden box.

WHAT MY BOYS SHOW ME

Dancing dachshunds
Flying squirrels
Justin Bieber's teenage girls Holding their hands to their mouths Insects flirting
The click of a gun
The fall of snow on a sidewalk Someone sleeping with snakes and mice
A happy Russian family eating breakfast with a bear Children tearing tongues from ice Planes crashing Tsunamis smashing tourists in Thailand People piling things until they fall Penguins falling off a wall Rugged Red Bull bikers barreling over cliffs Lunatics diving into parking lots
A boy flipping bottles and books onto shelves
A leopard licking lollipops
A Rottweiler cuddling a cat Bar graphs of billionaire youtuber boys
The largest leech, the slowest snake Jamie Oliver baking a cake Supernovas, white dwarfs Someone explaining gluons and quarks Glaciers calving, gamers swearing People doing stupid things In endless streams of Tik Tok memes Boys in jail
Men in limbo breaching bail
Michael Jackson on MTV Things they know will anger me

TADPOLES

Approach them gently for they can sense your presence and hear your silent movements through their skin.
Sneak the tin below them.
Don't rush.
Your sister will teach you the trick – how to pull the net through the rice stalks without breaking the surface or stirring the silt.
If you are lucky you can coax one into the hollow of your cupped hands and feel it brush against your palm.

SONG AND DANCE
(for John Cooper Clarke)

Ring a bubble
Tickle a spoon
Sing a sestina to the owly moon Rub a springline an' blow 'er a kiss Forage the field for the phrase that you missed Ruffle the tinfoil tacked to that tree Hum absolute zero on the count of three Glue a howling wolf howl to a Chopin ballade Whistle winter
Bow a fish
Clap the Star-Spangled Banner till the neighbors go mad Transpose the wind to a key Bob can play With that killer horn player from Monterey Strike a blanket
Drag a drum
Tap some tinsel with your thumb Pluck a spider's mooring thread, Then whistle a dirge to the newlywed Record the bomb blast's murmur,
The ashtray's sigh,
The fall of a flower on broken glass,
The notes Bach forgot in the B minor Mass

WAVING HER SNOW ANGEL WINGS

And here's January at the bottom of the hill all bundled up in beginnings
waving her snow angel wings.

This must be February snuggling into March.
I love the way their little hands curl round the secrets of their dreams.

April fooled us on her first day, flipped herself over and winked she was May just beyond the photo's edge.

Is that June or July dipping a toe in the lake waving to the dot of August on the distant pier.

I managed to catch a sliver of the edge of September running after the bell rings in circles like a listless circus lion.

October changing color.
Odd how the tang of fall lingers on the tip of the tongue when we turn it inside out.

November on his first day of school in his pungent suit of apprehension toes curled tight in the tips of his new shoes.
Waft of autumn dread.

Oh, look at December at the top of the hill on his sled all bundled up in endings waiting for his sister's signal – waving her snow angel wings.

WATCHING THEM WANDER

Today I'll write for the pleasure of gazing at the jagged shoreline of my words zigzag wanderings.
Just today I'll silence the censor and let them race through my stanzas pulling their flimsy kites of meaning.
Some will saunter round my commas.
Some will soften my full stops.
One might call a colon to task or pull from her pocket a Dickinsonian dash.
Today I'll let my lovely adjectives rouge their cheeks and spot their breasts with L'Eau Sézane to snag my stolid nouns.

SOMETHING

Something in the way you break my eggs and lock your little jam jars.
You burn and scrape my toast like no other lover.
Something in the way you run your fingers down the length of my tie.
Something in the hiss of your iron,
the snap of fresh sheets,
the borax bite,
the choo-choo scrub of the ring in the tub.
Something in the way you wear your garden gloves and the tinkle of the trowels that hang from your hips, and the way you purse your lips when you spray the daffodils.
No woman can gargle like you or sniff and clear their throat with such panache.
Something in the way you move the rugs and rub the corner of your eye before you go to sleep.

THE BANYAN TREE

How many children have climbed these limbs that will long outlive them, to run their hands down your tangled strands of hair? Will they remember the sweet musty smell of the lichen lodged in your hollows, the chittering of the dusky warblers nestling in your niches, the echo of their grandmother's call to cling harder?
Or maybe something they see in the distance will surface in their last dream – a flicker of sunlight on a sail, a puff of smoke from an absent-minded train.

THANK YOU

In the time it takes to touch the tip of your tongue to your teeth to say it – the birth of a billion stars.

ON BODILY LOVE IN TIME

(after the marvelous, inimitable Andrew Marvell)

When evening Dew does Temper Time's delay And Curtains veil the wane of public Light
The course of Labor's rambling Toil by day Is left for brief respite in play by Night As two combine in Lace of Cupids Net
And bodily Flow'rs are basked in fragrant Sweat

Betwixt the flight and flag of sweet Embrace With limb to limb enlaced in bod'ly Pleasure Time's Pace seems changed and hides the Trace Of its passage in Fire and earthly wanton Leisure How odd that flight of fancy free, and yet Within lost Time the sense of self forget

To April's spring in Kairos they delight Released from Aion's ageless wax and wane
And yore and fate of Chronos' sequent Flight As both released from movement do obtain The endless pull of Time they chance rely on That sets the Stage upon which they will die on

Does not that little death that women feign Drive men to cast time's Kernel in their Seed In which new Life through comingling contain Allowing Time to once again proceed Tempering the sense of his demise
The gaze upon her marvelous milky Thighs